It's modern hardware, but if you grew up with an Apple II, you'll be right at home. It runs Linux, which is a modern OS, but with only 4 MB of total disk space available (and 8MB of RAM), it's a cramped environment, which makes it a challenge to make it run the modern software you want to run and still fit in that tiny space. I'll be covering some of the alternative firmwares that are available, and a brief non-technical overview of some of the Linux embedding projects that have played a part in making it work.
